That realization has the effect of more and more calling into question certainties about growth, productivism, extractivism and the dominant development model. It opens a debate around two options : Extending the current productivist models by correcting them by adopting green industries and producing environmental technologies ; or moving to completely different models and forms of growth and development, where the logic of living well and respecting the environment takes precedence over that of unlimited growth and competition. Placing the food system at the forefront of local, inclusive (social performance), sustainable (environmental performance) and diverse (cultural performance) development means promoting a real “agri-food transition”, rendered necessary due to an excessive number of negative external factors in a food system that is now far too globalised. The complementarity of urban and rural could work if metropolis/cities consider that de agricultural land (creating employments, economical development with small enterprises, as well as environmental and social positive externalities) constitutes the main element in their food policies, and therefore , the main element of the quality of life of their population. Urban food system shouldn't be base on an” artificialisation” of food production but should be based on rural areas, on biodiversity, on the development of a social economy, circular economy and short circuits. To succeed that, alliances should be formalised with a precise road map, alliances between cities and regions (urban-rural areas) and between local-regional governments and farmer organisations. That is the reason why Régions de France, within UCLG régions, call for strong advocacy and greater involvement of local and regional gouvernement in the negotiation

Context Contexte 100 words/ 100 mots	Many contemporary challenges related indeed to the agricultural and food system: employment – 50% of jobs across the world are in the food system -, health – food deficits and dietary imbalances sit side by side, health warnings are proliferating -, climate – 30% of global greenhouse gas emissions are generated by the food system - natural resource management – 75% of fresh water is consumed in or by the world food system, mainly via agricultural activities... The construction of a shared vision and the implementation of partnerships and joint initiatives can generate a tenfold increase in the capacity to tackle the negative externalities of a largely globalised food system, but also reinforce the capacity of metropolises and major cities to work towards a transition and, in doing so, defend the renewed excellence of our food and culinary cultures. Placing the food system at the forefront of local, inclusive (social performance), sustainable (environmental performance) and diverse (cultural performance) development means promoting a real “agri-food transition”, rendered necessary due to an excessive number of negative external factors in a food system that is now far too globalised. The complementarity of urban and rural could work if metropolis/cities consider that de agricultural land (creating employments, economical development with small enterprises, as well as environmental and social positive externalities) constitutes the main element in their food policies, and therefore , the main element of the quality of life of their population. Urban food system shouldn't be base on an” artificialisation” of food production but should be based on rural areas, on biodiversity, on the development of a social economy, circular economy and short circuits. To succeed that, alliances should be formalised with a precise road map, alliances between cities and regions (urban-rural areas) and between local-regional governments and farmer organisations. That is the reason why Régions de France, within UCLG régions, call for strong advocacy and greater involvement of local and regional gouvernement in the negotiation processes that determine
